I am working on it, but have yet to finish the one I had committed to on Idaho history. I am doing a lot of field work for that one, so I am really finding it hard to fit the salts in.....

Inez: I once had one of these beautiful Locke sets in it's original case but I sold it to Sherry Diamond. I think they are away right now, but maybe when they get back she'll share a picture of it. It has the same type of Burmese shading.

I was only thinking of glass when I thought up the "Changing Colors" theme, but these are very beautiful. Thanks for sharing them. Time to go look for a few of my own color changes.

This is a salt I purchased many years ago. I think I bought it from Jim and Marlene Nelson. It is not flashed. The colors are in the glass and the salt is polished brightly and very heavy in the hand. It is so beautiful and I have never seen another like it.

This is a salt I purchased recently. I think it was from Nancy V. Don't recall what the shading is called.

small round Rubina? Amberina? salt The difference always confuses me.

39 Debi Raitz

10-11-2010 04:01 PM ET (US)

Nancy D: Amberina (amber-red) is what your salt is. Rubina is the three colored salts like Ed posted (10-14). And blurina is blue to clear or blue to amber.

	Debi
40	Debi Raitz Now I'm confused too because I thought the cranberry to clear was also called Rubina. And that gorgeous green to clear? I have no idea!	10-11-2010 04:03 PM ET (US)
	Debi
41	Nancy Dietel I think it is really Amberina. I seem to have missed that it is very dusty and I should have cleaned it better before I posted it. It is a very beautiful, thin, colored glass. It doesn't have the specs showing in the photo. Sorry. Nancy D	10-12-2010 10:57 AM ET (US)
42	Debi Raitz Did a little digging and I think the "rubina" salts that Ed posted (10-14) are really called rubina verde .	10-14-2010 04:00 PM ET (US)
	Debi
43	Lisa Tiedeman That's interesting, as during our last meeting a bunch of us were sitting around talking about Amberina, as Wilfred is an expert in that area ~ including Rubina Verde! I had never heard of the color Rubina Verde before! Neat! :)	10-15-2010 06:35 PM ET (US)
	Lisa :)
44	Debi Raitz I should have remembered that from before but it just crept away, out of my brain, until I saw it again in print. Rubina=ruby and verde=green but that still doesn't account for the blue color there as well.	10-15-2010 07:17 PM ET (US)
45	Nancy Villaverde Nancy D did get the cranberry with vaseline applied rim and feet from me. It isn't an example of rubina verde since the greenish vaseline is a separate applied area. Not that anyone here said it is. I think amberina is red shading to amber. I always forget which direction of the two colors is called reverse amberina. I'm still away from home, but I think someone has posted most if not all that I have in changing colors. I saw the tri-color salt or nut with little feet several years ago in a big mall in Eureka Springs, AR. I didn't buy it after deciding it was a nut and fairly new, but it was sooo pretty. I need to scrol back down and see if the maker was mentioned. Nancy V	10-17-2010 04:38 PM ET (US)
46	Nancy Villaverde Yes, Summit. Nancy V	10-17-2010 04:40 PM ET (US)
47	Debi Raitz http://www.cambridgeglass.org/articles/7780/78crystalball65a.php The link above is to an article on Cambridge Rubina. I was expecting to see ruby to clear and instead, it's what I would call Rubina Verde. So it's probably a case of sellers and collectors calling any glass that goes from one color to another any "-ina" name they can	10-18-2010 04:29 PM ET (US) remember at the time.

At the end of the article, it's interesting that the Cambridge pieces that are mostly red with just a hint of yellow are still considered Carmen Red and not amberina.

Pretty salt, Nancy D. I have one that I really like. Pattern is Swirl. Some of these are prettier than others to me, rosy rather than orange to clear as you can see in the back side and foot of this photo. Nancy V

Both of these postings duplicate ones by Inez, the plain paneled one is in Inez's set, and the cranberry set is very like her green to clear set. I didn't notice until I scrolled all the way to the beginning of this category.
