Hi,
It is typical summer weather here in Australia, nearly 36
degrees (metric) or 98 degrees at the moment. Not normally that hot where we are, but we do have the few hot days when the rest of the state gets a heat wave.

Hi P.J. - Hey my pink friend - Boats are gonna be on thier own some month and I think swans too -- Enough of both to fill a months worth of drooling - er I mean pictures -- I love the white shell and swan - I keep buying it and then selling it and wishing I hadn't sold it - So now I have one of my very own I am keeping - Love the simplicity of it -- Keep the boats in dry dock until thier month comes around - lol lol -- Mary

Fact about Hawaii I didn't know till I lived here a while: shells aren't found much here, only broken bits on the beaches. Shells for sale here are all from the Philippines or other sources. Nancy V
50 Mary Kern 02-02-2011 04:34 PM ET (US)	Pretty salts - Bummer on the imported shells ----- M
51 Nancy Villaverde 02-02-2011 06:00 PM ET (US)	Yes, our sandy beaches here are mostly shielded by reefs, which don't let intact shells through even if they are out there. The only island noted for shells is the "forbidden island" of Niihau, privately owned and source of the tiny shells used to make jewelry. I've bought bags of pretty shells to take to my grandchildren, knowing they aren't from any local source. Nancy V

I think barnacle is the right name for the sea creature that I just posted. It is shaded pink on the inside but the outside and feet are cream or light yellow. There may be more Belleek shell shapes. Doesn't someone have the Royal Bayreuth lobster claws?

Nothing like being speedy to get my pictures up of my "at the beach" salts. :-) But, then, I guess it's better late than never.

You guys just made it in with the additions today. I nearly changed it earlier this afternoon but though I'd better wait and I'm glad I did. Love that fish set, Susie, and also the turtle double Cathy posted. There are really some very neat salts out there!
Changing the topic now....Hooray for March!
