I don't think they are identical, my glass more transparent with opalescence too, but they look like cousins at least. Mine is polished flat around the rim, but I don't think it is your piece with the scallops polished off, seems to flare more at the rim. 102 Nancy Villaverde 03-01-2012 08:56 PM ET (US) IP: 75.80.213.127	Yes, I do have lots of green salts, and some I didn't even get to, but I want MORE! That's what greed can do to you. lol I am thinking that green salts aren't as rare as I thought. I do think that there are fewer green art glass salts in stands than in most other colors. Pink seems predominant, and there are quite a few in vaseline, some blue, but not many green. Janelle has two lovely ones in her group shot, but even they have only a band of green. Nancy V

Don't know anything about this one. Seller thought it was old and it does look like it, but someone told me they thought it was a repro. I don't know.

I think that about does for me with green except a few rather common individual that come in other colors too. I do have one other...a forest green one that I don't have a picture of. Anyone remember 'the birdman'? He was around in early eBay days. He's in Australia. I got it from him and he said it was Australian glass. Maybe Janelle knows something about it. It's a pretty distinctive deep green color. It's plain and round with just cut notches around the top rim.

Thanks, Mary. Kralik was the ID. I love both of mine. I started on the Fenton nut cups when my sister bought 4 purple iridescent taped together and labeled plastic in a grungy flea for $1. I showed your jade green pulled differently, and I have a vaseline that I didn't show. Some are cupped almost straight up and some pulled wide at the rim. I think I have 6.

If you look at the base of the one on the right you will see some of the damage where the glass is cracked. Mary, in Hawaii we spell it koi, but maybe Joan's fish really are coy. lol
Are we running low on green salts, and it's only March 5th?

A Mexican souvenir -- Coca Cola Bottle Green salt. The seller and I believe it was made from melted drink bottles. It is very poor quality, full of tiny bubbles and inclusions. I usually have it on display with the Coke Bottle silver spoon I've shown below. Together they make a great salt history story.

I call them 'grotesques' and have been fascinated by them. After researching, I found that they are joke saki cups, when you drink from the sweet face inside, other people see the "Oni" or demon face. There is a festival, early in February when the people clean their houses, like our spring cleaning, and someone dresses as an Oni and walks through the streets. The people throw beans at him to keep him away.

My sister found a full set here on one of her visits and had them mounted in a shadow box, turned out very nice. I have 5, but one is smaller than the others, from a different set, and may repeat one of the old men with not very distinctive features. My research has not yielded any results on this pattern or manufacturer. I purchased several of these pieces at an estate auction only because I was so taken with their unique style and charm. The additional pieces which I am offering for sale are a creamer; salt or small nut cup; covered butter with drain insert and underplate (long hairline on underplate). A shop search for Queens Rose will bring you to the additional pieces." This is the green salt I have that I spoke of earlier. It was purchased from Australia and the seller said it was Australian glass. I don't know about that, but it is a really deep shade of green with just a hint of bluish green in it. Has hand cut notches all around the rim, but other than that, it's perfectly plain rather thick glass.

That heavy green one looks as if it might be cut from an emerald. There are some ugly green shades, but this is why I love green.
