We will do holders with plain liners another time. I know many salts fit other topics we've had, but don't be afraid to post them to whatever category they fit in. Most of mine are blue and have already been seen but if we want to make these different topic pages as complete as possible, we need to post many of the same salts over again. Debi

This set is very small, almost half the size of the other Midwinter set, Made in England EPNS c1920s-1930s based on the tops

The last one I have with a holder in the same material as the salt. Gaudy Dutch

I don't care for very many of those blue and white with the red, but I really like that set with the matching stand. I have a couple that I think are considered an oyster pattern rather than Imari.

All china so far. Here's a group of some of my art glass in stands, sorry about the poor quality. I'm too tired (read lazy) to take new photos, this from my records.

Should say I love all those china sets. They are especially nice when there is an open salt, but the shape of those that Inez posted with the triangular pieces are really interesting. I like both of Kent's sets. I don't have any china sets with holders though I have a couple on matching trays.

Lovely Monot Stumpf, Mary. There is a page of them in stands OSC p. 87. I had a set of three with the crescent moons in different stones and one with the butterfly holder, but they aren't my thing and I sold them. I was so sure I kept a photo in my files, but I can't find it. I see a couple of them dated 6/2/08 on my selling pages here.

I have a couple of salt-in stand stories. If you go back to image 11, my group, the first salt at left front, apricot in large stand, was a gift when I was visiting a woman in a lovely home in the tiny village of Barnby

-in-the-Willows, England. I admired it on a table and she picked it up and said "Do take it. It means nothing to me, got it for a few pounds at a local sale." I protested, and my sister, ever helpful, said "You can't take that." But she insisted, and you can imagine how easily I gave in. She gave me an extra stand too!
My best buy was the tulip-striped a couple of salts over to the right. It was on ebay described as "small lid to something." A non-salty friend spotted it and directed me to the auction. Since is has a berry pontil and had no stand with it, the seller was looking at it upside down. I haven't had the time or patience to scan for lids ever after.

Small set marked Crescent China, England, missing its stand. I'd love the have a stand for these, shaker & mustard only 1 1/8" wide, salt 1 3/8". I suppose chances are about as bad as an extra stands for art glass salts. I put it here rather than bury it in Wanted.

Thanks, Janelle. I mistakenly said Lyleann on the other string. It appears that the size is right, and the seller was able to adjust shipping down. I didn't ask directly, just said I had looked at ebayAU less since their postage went so high. I didn't see why the simple wire stand would cost $36 to ship.

Hi Nancy,
Looking forward to seeing your set in its new holder. It is great when you get something you have been looking for. I have been searching for a Burtles and Tate Glass Flower Boat Rg No 29106 for well over two years. Found I had missed a opalescent Rose coloured one by about 3 days a couple of weeks ago, it was on Ebay at a buy it now. I was so upset, would have preferred not to have found it. As they say "Such is Life"

I feel your pain, Janelle, and I'm grateful to you for pointing out the frame while it was still available. I'm keeping my fingers crossed that my pieces fit. The seller gave careful measurements, so it's no one's fault if it doesn't fit, just chalk it up to Murphy's Law--whatever can go wrong will.
I've accepted the view that if you saw a seller's shipping cost and bid anyway, you have no grounds to complain later, but I did mention high cost of shipping from Australia before bidding, and the seller said he would weigh the stand and subsequently cut the shipping by 2/3's. Only then did I bid. He estimates 10 days to arrive, which is about as good as it gets from Australia to Hawaii.

I thought there would be too, Nancy. I thought we could do this topic with exposed salts in frames where much of the salt is showing, and then next month we could do Framed In, where only liners are in holders and you don't see the glass at all except cutouts in the sides. I'll go ahead and add my salts but we've all seen them before I'm sure! I don't have that many art glass in holders.

One of my mostest favoritest salts - The Gillender master swan set - I also have a frosted swan so I can change them around - Anyone sees on of these swans by itself in another color - Please let me know - The set is circa 1890 - I am thinking seriously about having the sleigh replated - m

I guess this one would fit here more than in the next month's topic - as you see the salt more than you see the frame - even though the salt would be considered a liner to most - It is unmarked but just the prettiest thing !! m

By request from Nancy D. Debi can look too. I think there are far fewer blue art glass salts in stands than pink or cranberry. Maybe Debi has cornered the market on blue. Pink does seem the most plentiful, followed by yellow, green, purple and blue, not necessarily in that order. I bought this one in an English antique fair with no stand. I keep moving it around since it fits in different ones. It's something like the Jack-in-a-Pulpit shape, little bubble in the tip on mine.

Question: do those salts shaped like Janelle's #100 ever start out with stands? They are said to be made by both English and American makers, often seen without stands and have nice flat little bases. Seen on ebay in wire stands fairly often too.

Fostoria made this shape but apparently only in clear glass according to their records. I don't know if other American companies also made something very similar, or if all the colored ones are English or European.
Thanks for showing the blue example of that salt, Nancy. It is one I don't have, but I am far from cornering the market on blue salts. There are so many more I'd love to own!

I really was kidding, Debi. I'm sure there are lots more blue salts out there, just not very easy to find. And Nancy D, I think I see a little bubble in the tip of your salt too. Maybe the glass blowers did that on purpose, or maybe it tended to happen when they pulled the tip up.

Hi - I do think the salts in post 100 were made expressly for their holders; others, I think have just been substituted in for whatever was in the frame originally. The first pic I post is like Janelle's; and I think they were a set to begin with. My second photo I think is a marriage of the two? And LOVE this topic, you have all posted so many amazing!! salts.....

Re the green "salt". If it was a salt it would be a master. The green insert has 6 feet like what is often found on thorn vases and I think is described as rustic style. It is 3" high and 4" across. It has Eleven vaseline swirls starting at the top and meeting in the base of the bowl. The EPNS stand is 6" from edge of handle to opposite handle and 2 1/2" high to the top of the rim that the bowl sits in. The base and top rim is 3" wide. The stand was made by Sandler & Aquilar 1898-1903 who were in Birmingham and London. The spoon sitting in it, is 4 1/4" long, and English. I have quite a lot of spoons this size so the salts they were used for must have been a big master size. Because of the feet on the vaseline bowl, it makes me wonder if this is a marriage although they do fit nicely.

Thanks for detail on the green salt, Janelle. I wondered what the glass bits showing through the holder were. I agree that the feet make it unlikely to have been made for a holder, but they look great together. The size is odd, but not the 5 inch width that is easy to identify as a jam or marmalade dish. I think it's gorgeous.

This piece may not exactly fit the current topic since it's a condiment set, but there is an open salt. And I wanted to show the set with its stand recently arrived from Australia. Thanks to Janelle for seeing the auction and telling me about it. The porcelain pieces are marked Crescent China, Made in England. The stand is also English and in wonderful condition.
 I asked before bidding if the $36 shipping charge was accurate; the seller said he weighed it and could ship for $12. Pays to ask, and definitely before bidding. Actual cost was $10.60, and I don't begrudge a seller a little handling charge. Shipping from Australia doesn't have to be as high as some auctions ask.
