Yup, polka dots! Mine is similar with cut to clear dots. It is the type with the opening off center.

I have one that matches Janelle's #13, but in blue. This one is marked. At one time I thought I'd try to collect all the colors, but only marked ones. This is still the only one I have. LOL

Here's a Wavecrest with dots around the top with an unusual cat design and a metal base with dots also. It's really a match holder rather than a salt.

Judy, I have a different version of your #31. Is yours marked Lalique? I think mine is a copy and is unmarked. It has 10 flat panels on both bowl and foot, makes a better salt than cordial. The purple frosted part on the stem is possibly more bumpy and lumpy.

Jane, it is not signed, it has 4629 and an "A" on the bottom. Appears to be made of pottery type Clay. Very much like Doulton but I believe all their pieces were marked. I have seen one other the same, but as to who made it, remains a mystery.

I can only imagine the reason they don't attract much attention is because they are not easily identified unless marked like Hawkes. They really should be more expensive than EAPG but they aren't. And I suppose if one likes to research and identify salts in their collection then these would always remain a mystery. Jytte: Your amethyst with the lace is very pretty. 241 Nancy C Villaverde★ 08-26-2015 12:35 PM ET (US) IP: 70.119.62.114	Debi, I agree that cut glass salts "should" be valued more than pressed glass ones, with the exception of the rare EAPG patterns of course. It's mind boggling that cut glass pieces that must have taken hours and hours to produce now sell for a few dollars. Ones like my 234 and Nancy D's 212 are large and spectacular enough to be exceptions, but I have several sparkly little gems that sold for under $10. Cut glass might be classed out of fashion.
242 Nancy Dietel★ 08-26-2015 12:48 PM ET (US) IP: 108.5.142.172	You are right, Nancy V. Cut glass is out of fashion. I have several family pieces that are large and spectacular. But I have been noticing in the last few years, a lot of similar pieces have been showing up in antique shops. A lot of the old Waterford, that were so prized and expensive, are also showing up at low prices. The younger generation doesn't seem to appreciate the beauty and intricacies of cut glass.

245 Nancy C Villaverde★ 08-26-2015 02:00 PM ET (US) IP: 70.119.62.114	With Waterford, you have to watch out for the newer pieces, now done for the department store market. Most of it isn't made in Ireland now. They aren't the quality of the older pieces and sell much lower. This may lower the value of even the older pieces. Some of the larger cut glass pieces still have high price tags, but I don't know if they are selling. I have a lovely bowl and pitcher that belonged to two grandmothers. I hope my daughter will like them one day. Your fan and diamond salt really is a gem, Nancy D.

Linda, I have a completely clear art glass in stand that I bought on ebay from an English seller. I've never seen one like it, but your

Yeah, yeah...that's it...Debi has recently embarked on a new venture known as "Salt Observations & Acquisitions". And in doing so, she has officially appointed Jan and I to head up her research & development department as her "Salt Observation Bosses"...or SOB's for short!! As SOBs we will now require you to turn over all salts that we deem beautiful, rare or valuable...or just ones we want! We will research the newly "acquired" salts and eventually provide you with "Beneficially Substantiated" documentation, also known as a BS Report, on what we have "observed" while they were in our possession. With Debi as COO, we believe this newly established business will grow at a rapid pace and therefore, please do not expect your salts to be returned anytime soon, as we will to be very busy little SOBs!! I applaud your selflessness , what a wonderful gesture from you all, saving us all the tedious research etc that goes into our acquisitions. PS I could cover the Southern Hemisphere and Europe for you if you like.
271 Debi Raitz★ 08-28-2015 06:01 AM ET (US) IP: 69.14.123.141	Janelle: As team leader I suggest you stick to Oz and New Zealand. That will cut the travel costs. We sure could use your help with the H&J Project. It's easier than you think. Do you have any images on your computer now? All you have to do is click the UPLOAD AN IMAGE button, click browse to locate the image on your computer, click on the image and then OPEN. When you're done typing your text you click the UPLOAD IMAGE AND SET CAPTION button (the only choice) and you're done.
