Had a couple of very dark Lotus salts. Thought they were dark red or amethyst. One was dark red, after closer examination. But this one turned out to be true black. Who knew?

Ooooh! I'm so jealous Kent! I have only the open salt and pepper shaker, not the entire set in a holder. Didn't have any pictures taken of it so I'm happy to see the full set.

Jet is a type of lignite, a precursor to coal, and is considered to be a minor gemstone. Jet is not considered a true mineral, but rather a mineraloid as it has an organic origin, being derived from decaying wood under extreme pressure. When "jet black" is used as a color name, it doesn't mean it's actually "jet" as described above. Black intaglios are black glass like Jane said, not made of the "mineraloid". I also saw another description that said if you hold jet to light it may have a red tinge around the edges. Not to be confused with black amethyst which is also just a type of black glass. I think it's mostly used in mourning jewelry and French jet is most desirable. Probably where the spelling "jette" comes from. |

Clear glass ivy creamer. The pattern shows more clearly in this glass. I have a small collection of tiny creamers and pitchers that just happened as I hunted for salts.

Black ivy creamer, much smaller than the pedestal piece, only 3" tall. I can't find the pedestal, may have sold it. I've had two of them over the years. It definitely showed purple in strong light, and the little creamer does too though the glass is so thick I can see purple only in the thinner parts of the pattern.

Jan, I found your black pedestal with a matching creamer, sugar and creamer set, but I put the pedestal into my salt collection anyway. It's shown in clear glass, ivy pattern, in Metz Early American Pattern Glass and called Sandwich Ivy. In the 2000 Ed, Metz corrected her ID to European rather than American glass, noted the dark version, which she called dark amethyst. Hold yours to a bright light and see if it doesn't show amethyst rather than true black. Metz guessed that the pedestal dish was for loaf sugar. I'll post a photo if I can get one.

Black is really elegant. I don't have many but I do like them.
Jan: I just came across a picture of your #24 in one of the children's toy glass books yesterday while looking to see if that little pedestal shown in H&J in green and again in pink that no one has might be a child's piece of glass. Didn't find it, but your piece is shown in black and clear glass. It's called SANDWICH IVY and is the sugar with a matching creamer. I don't know why it's classified as toy glass because at 3-1/4" diameter it sounds like a full size sugar to me. I thought children's glass was more "miniature".
I find it hard to believe that no one has an H&J 334 or 578.
