This particular mark with the 13 at the top was used from 1737 - 1866 - Unfortunately the information page for it has not been completed - the 13 Loch is for the quality of the silver - that much I remember but not the grade it would be

This piece has numerous marks on it as shown here - It also has several punch marks in the base line that are non-readable - I will be glad when this section on the web site is completed and I can research the rest of it - But happy to know where - who and when --
Its a start - more soon

Beautiful silver tiered triangle - It carries pseudo marks - which means fake - Some of the marks were overlooked because the silver was actually sterling - Most times these marks were to make the buyer think the items were from England - English silver was considered to be the best - Though this one carries a lion pasant it is actually silver plate - It was designed to appear to look like its Sheffield counterpart - The real one was two tone - silver and gold - Though a beautiful piece certainly not sterling or English - Marks to follow

Though some icons are correct on this row - they do not make sense all together - First is a MAKERS MARK of C.F. = No English maker with this mark - The next mark which should be the CITY/TOWN MARK is illegible though appears to be some sort of tiered items and Sheffield is a Crown - The DATE LETTER is a very straight capital E and would supposedly indicate 1848 - The PURITY MARK is the well known Lion and this piece is definitely not sterling - The last is the DUTY MARK of Queen Victoria's head indicating a tax had been paid on the item - This DUTY MARK was used between 1838 and 1890 so they at least got the date mark correct - So some pseudo marks may have a bit of truth to them and others not so much - Research needs to be done on any marks you can make out even if they carry the lion -

Mary, to me those marks look like Exeter Assay Office with the E for 1862 -63. The CF could have been for Charles Favel who made triangular Salts like these. Often Silversmiths were commissioned to make certain articles for clients and then had them assayed. It may have not been a mark they used very often.

Also not all initials are identified to a particular silversmith, the Cartouche does look like this but has not been positively identified. For me, I really think it is Exeter Silver. It does look like the three towered turreted castle, (not to be confused with Edinburgh) and the other marks match. Silversmiths were not restricted to just one assay office and although they may have used one near them, they could still apply to have items assayed and recorded at other offices

Sorry Mary, cannot read my own post. E is for 1861-2 and although the C F mark shows a mark registered for Sheffield there was nothing stopping any silversmith registering a mark at any assay office

This mark on a silver triangular salt made by Charles Favell (spelling differs site to site) in 1873
But assayed in Sheffield. Sorry if I have been a bit pedantic, will now disappear.

Thank you Janelle - I had a feeling about Exeter - but did not pursue it - DUH -
And I never knew about being able to register everything at assay offices outside of the actual production site - Always something to learn here - And the most important is to be a bit more diligent in my research and follow hunches - You are the silver expert and appreciate your added information and input - Nice to see my fingerprints are around the world - lol lol

My favourite pair. Silver Salt Pourers Sheffield 1912 made by Harry Atkin of Atkin Bros. Has the design 555684 registered in 1910. An unusual salt as salt could be poured from the small holes at the end. Doing away with a spoon. They also made a bulberous one but that is the only ones I have every seen. And it has J monogrammed on each one. ☺

My goodness - While I have been somewhere other than the salt world - You all came to this party with pretties - and you have made it easier for me as I was trying to show the marks also - So now if I have them already taken I will - but if not I can just describe them - Cool

Mary,, I'm just too lazy to go find the salt and try to capture the marks. LOL Maybe if I feel ambitious enough I'll take a shot at the case most of my silvers are in, so you can see the mess I have, in a couple days. Tomorrow I'm out of town, tonite I'm curling up and try to finish the book I've been reading.

The picture makes this one look short and stocky where it actually is a long narrow piece - I am sure there was a liner - this shape is almost impossible to replace - He has also lost his chains - Wheels move freely - I should probably see if I can find a long stretch of very fine chain and replace all the ones that are missing -- Yeah right -

This is the last piece resting on that shelf - He is complete except he may have had a fitted clear glass liner - It would be difficult to put in place and to remove though - There are two words pressed in the outer base of sleigh - they both say STERLING - no other marks are visible -
Need to do some work around the house - so will give the board a break and be back later with the tiny wall shelf's silver salts -

Linda - Thanks for the invite to chatter - Other than now - late at night for everyone but me and Debi if she is having one of her sleepless periods - I have little free time - Painters are here and dealing with three scared cats because of the noise - or should I say racket - They are moving right along but so much to be done - Right now we have all but the kitchen window masked off and the sliding doors in the back - I think they left them open for us tonight incase we needed to get out the back door - Not easy for Bob either as he cannot stay up waiting in case they need something - So I am staying home this week just in case - and the doorbell has rung a couple of times when he was down - so glad I could do my job --

These are beautiful. They stay nice and silvery in the case. I don't have to shine. (Giggle).....on closer inspection I need to shine.☹

My first silver salt - I purchased it in an antique store in Old Town extremely early in my collecting - Paid sterling price for German silver - But care not - Also the piece that almost made me walk out of my first convention in San Francisco and just throw what salts I had away because of one person - Glad I stayed long enough to see the good in the other people there -

I fully understand Mary. That was only my second convention and very early in my collecting. Most of what I had was very inferior to other people's salts. But it was my roots in collecting and probably why I still value all of my clear glass individuals. Most people will only have some of the rarer ones like the Morning Glory and other pattern glass but concentrate on expensive high end salts. That has never been the heart of my collection. Just as I started out loving the blue and white china and amassed those. Each is not worth much but together they are priceless in my eyes. If my collection ever ends up in an auction I am sure the clear glass and blue and white ones would end up on lot trays which is very sad to think about.

You will have to get a kennel soon Janelle - Your reclining dogs show up on eBay off and on and depending on the seller - anywhere from $60 to $600 - Similar to the standing gent and lady holding baskets - Depends on the position of the basket as to the age - and - of course once again - the seller - I do love your standing one but let's keep that a secret -

These are all so beautiful! Do any of you remember Dan Snyder? I got several of my salts from him years ago when he was closing out his collection. He once

Another new arrival which also reaffirms my newest total trend - Navaho with spoon - No arks - I have had several of these over the years - but this is the first one I absolutely adore - I love the shape (maybe this tribe lived closer to Area 51) and the spoon is to die for - I have always heard that even if un-marked these pieces are always of high quality silver and even sterling in some cases sans sterling on them - Would appreciate any input on that statement - which was more an inquiry than a bold fact from me -

Mary: I have that exact salt and spoon and mine isn't marked either. I don't have much silver so it's a little hard for me to compare, but this feels heavier than what I think sterling would feel like. On the other hand, if these were plated you would expect to see one with plating rubbed off and I never have. Maybe the weight is because it's a double thickness everywhere but where the scrolls are? I don't know. Silver isn't my thing, but only because of the tarnishing. I think it's beautiful.

These always polish to a shine no matter how tarnished they are - this one being no exception - this would lead me to believe they are at the very least a high grade silver - I do not have a feeling for the Indian silversmiths working in plate, but I do know that many of their silver jewelry pieces are far from sterling - It is like I have many 800 pieces and even though they all have passed that standard - I have to say that in working with them and polishing them - feeling their heft - all 800 silvers are not alike -
Thanks for your input Debi - Every little bit thrown together and we might actually come up with a really good guess -

I am in awe Mary, those salts have blown me away, I have long been an admirer of the triangular style but those have taken it to a new level. Definitely been some eye candy shown this month from everyone.

Mary, I'm a day behind, but I think your Navaho #243 matches my salt in the set with matching pepper #201. The only difference is the placement of the bar in the applied coils. Alas, no mark on mine either.

Thanks Jytte - Not as good as holding it in my hands - but the marks are quite interesting - and I am running out of room for silver - but keep buying more -

Have found the match to the Judiaca shaker - The one I have has 3 men and the match has two - Shakers - on my I am in trouble because now I want the shaker to match my Navajo - Nancy did not realize or care to concern myself with shakers to those salts - Now that I know - I may be in trouble - April here today will try and get a couple up before we leave for the grocery store -

It certainly is pretty Nancy - The shape would tend to lean French, but the German's allowed more pieces to pass without marks and it also has their look to it - Which ever it is beautiful -
This one is a pressed piece mixed metals with the feet being the only applied and separate pieces - I just drool myself every time I look at it -

Sterling piece that highly resembles the ones from Spain that have the sweet cherubs playing different instruments and I do believe in its prior life it actually had one of those cherubs on it - Perhaps a gag or a fun replacement if the cherub got bent or in some manner abused - At this point I think it is a one of a kind - If any of you have seen more or even different fishes - please let me know

The N in the rhombus indicates it is plating over alpalca - which is strange as

	most pieces of that alloy stand alone without a coating - First piece with the plating I have owned Must find nourishment - will return before midnight for the last of what I think I can post within this month's topic --
