Salts or Not Salts
This could be something you purchased thinking it was a salt, or something you bought because it fit in with your collection even though it's definitely not a salt.

61 nancy Villaverde 04-03-2018 01:32 PM ET (US) IP: 97.99.220.53	Denise, #36 has an unpolished pontil, no mark, and it's tiny, 1 1/2" tall, 1 3/4" wide at the shoulder. The opening is 7/8" wide, so a lady would have to be an accurate spitter. I agree it's spittoon shaped, maybe just a mini cabinet piece. Prettier coloration than my photo shows. Edited 04-03-2018 01:33 PM
62 Lynda LaLonde 04-03-2018 03:17 PM ET (US) IP: 174.131.116.250	 Denise, #45... It is similar. But size is different. My jelly/jammer is 2 1/8 inches tall (verses 2 7/8) and 3 5/8 wide (verses 3 7/8). Same ruffels and glass ridging. My price was a WHOLE lot less also. Calling that piece a miniature finger bowl makes me question the sellers knowledge. Course, my knowledge is limited. It would be nice if the gang checked the auction out and gave their opinion.

Linda H, I have several small vases though I don't consider them a collection. I do have one other collection of miniature pitchers. Maybe when we develop an eye for salts, we focus on other smalls as well. I've found that I pick out anything that is about salt-sized.

My collection of small pitchers, mostly EAPG. A couple are in patterns that included open salts. The ivory is the peacock pattern by Sowerby, and the black and clear are the old Ivy pattern. Metz named it Sandwich Ivy but a later book identified it as not EAPG but European. The blue Davidson is 2" tall to give idea of size of all.

Another 'not salts' small collection. I just couldn't resist these tiny pitchers, tallest about 2". I think the green enameled one is gorgeous. I bought a lot of 5 miniatures, all in the same glass and pattern, sold 4 for $100 each but kept this one. The ivory one is Wedgwood.

In post 80, the blue pitcher in center front is Hawaiian Lei pattern. I wanted a salt in that pattern because of all my years living in Hawaii. I bought a salt described as Hawaiian Lei from a pair of collectors a few years ago, but unfortunately they were wrong about ID. I settled for the little creamer. Maybe any "salt" would be an individual sugar anyway.

117 Debi Raitz★ 04-06-2018 06:31 AM ET (US) IP: 69.14.123.141	Jan: Your #91-92 is definitely a salt. It's shown on a Davidson catalog page under the banner of Salts, made in three sizes. I think that teal dish Lynda showed recently is also on that page as a salt. The catalog drawings are not 100% accurate but I think that's it.
118 Jan Schmidt 04-06-2018 09:36 AM ET (US) IP: 98.23.11.243	Yes, that's the pattern all right, Debi, but this guy is HUGE! I have a huge collection of copper that's still packed. I sold Coppercraft guild pieces for a year before it shut down. I have trays, goblets, tumblers, placks, bowls, coffee server, candle holders, planters, pots and pans. Every penny I made went back into the copper. Now I don't even display it. Glass took over. I always loved crystal but just got pieces I needed and used for parties. But once the hook set..... look out. Here are some of the candle holders I collect.

OK, those two salts were made by Davidson in England, circa 1870- see Reprint AA in H&J OR go see the catalog pages Debi has in the REFERENCES section of this site. Yes, they are marked with the rampant lion mark. It is noted there that they came in three different sizes. I know it is shown in H&J somewhere but without legs, will look it up and get back with you. I am also pretty sure that Ed commented on that fact in SALTY COMMENTS.

Listed as a salt, no dimensions given and I didn't ask! Matched an old fan vase I have. Upon arrival, it's twice the size of even a master/table salt. I wrote the seller and he offered my money back, but he admitted he didn't know salts. I kept it because it is beautiful and I never checked for size.

Jytte, lolololol, that is not a face a child would love. I was kidding. I'm not sure what Tobys were for but I know a lot of people like and collect them.
Mary, I don't like Vaseline glass either. Except for the Davidsons. I do like the ones with opalescence. Changes the look of the Vaseline glass. I have to tell you why I just can't like Vaseline glass. Use to be, ages ago, I started I V's and added liquid multivitamins to it. Those patient's urine looked just like this glass and I can't get past that.

Nancy D, I remember having some of those pretty bowls in yellow and blue with opalescent rims, berry or sauce bowls I think. I think they were about 4 inches wide. I still see this kind of bowl listed as a salt from time to time. I don't know is sellers really don't know that salts aren't this large or just think calling it a salt will get more sales than calling it by its real name. Same with jam or jelly dishes.

I have 5 of these "face" cups, probably for sake I think though they make nice salts. This is the only woman in the group, which I think are the 7 immortals of Asian mythology. The second picture is of the inside, a musical instrument I think.

Here are all 5 faces. I think the two at lower right are the same character. The smaller one isn't from the same set as the others, smaller and with a different interior. All are glazed inside, which would make them good for serving a drink in them. A group of these are shown in some salt collectors' book, Smith I think.

My sister found all 7 or 8 of the Chinese immortals, don't remember which number. She had them framed in a deep frame, makes a neat wall decoration. I think maybe she found them on a visit to me in Honolulu, where there are so many Asian items.

Don, Did you see the glass that Jeff Evans auction is selling this weekend. Too big for salts but gorgeous iridescent vases and other just beautiful peices? In the pictures of the meeting at your house, was that your collection of Roseville Pottery? I don't collect them but if I could I would. Been in love with Roseville, McCoy.... so many others, since my 20's.

You may have seen Roseville in a photo, I have A LOT of it(not near as many salts as I have!) but I've been collecting it for about as long as I have salts! An example is in 6 in. Cornucopias, I have over 20 different ones! Enough said!
