Linda, No. 9. It looks like T.H. Not a B. Could it be T.H.H with the extra H not quite impressed, Cannot be Thomas Hayes as he did not use a extra dot and was bankrupt in 1907
But possible T. H. Hazelwood who took over Thomas Hayes. No other maker with the extra dot Loetz, iridized green body with clear rigaree. English sterling hallmarks, a little worn but I think it's the leopard mark for London. The glass is lovely but the form leaves a little to be desired. The body is well shaped but the wide frill make it look squat to me.

Nancy V - your "glass" are so beautiful
 Debi - Oh I misunderstood.....but you are right....still I do not understand why I am not able to find some who could have an idea about my French salts ...even the ones that are signed.....I am in an American Facebook group and not long ago I asked "if there were other than another Danish woman and me coming from Europe".....one!!! told he came from England.....and I have not succeeded in finding European groups
 Here some of my French signed salts

Thanks, Jytte. I used to belong to a very helpful on-line group of glass and pottery collectors. We categorized ourselves as "glassies" or "potties". I was a glassy.
 But here are two pottery salts I've always liked. I think both are by Macintyre though only the one on the right is marked. English registry mark and the word Macintyre impressed, hard to read.
 I got it from a most kind English seller. I told him it was missing a rim when I purchased it, and he checked with a friend who had one like it with a rim and an extra rim. So he included the loose rim in the package when he mailed it to me. The rim is some sort of base metal, or a silvered one that has lost all its silver. The one on the left looks like Macintyre to me, but the rim is marked EPNS for electro plated nickel silver. A very similar pair are pictured in the OSC at Plate 650, page 219.

Looking more carefully, maybe the salt on the left is some maker other than Macintyre. The shape and the look of the pottery are different. The OSC said alternating panels of brown and cobalt, but mine has brown all the way around, cobalt "splotches" both large and small, a few white spots. No white interior like the one marked Macintyre.

Here's one I'd like some help on. Have any of you ever seen an old pedestal salt with lemon-squeezer foot that had a silver rim? I hadn't. There is no mark on the rim, expertly done with a cut on one point, half cut on the other to allow the bend. I'm wondering if the rim was added by someone to cover a chipped rim on a beloved piece.

64 Nancy V 01-09-2019 01:13 PM ET (US) IP: 97.99.220.53	Sorry the pic is a little blurred. I was too lazy to attach the camera to its stand.

68 Nancy V 01-10-2019 12:27 PM ET (US) IP: 97.99.220.53	Thanks, Don. The rim of the salt has been ground down to accommodate the rim, very nice job whenever it was done. I like older pedestal salts and have several, but never saw one with a silver rim.

Some really great ones Susie. I like sterling rims so much more than the plated ones. Thought I could restore a couple I have but they must be pewter or pot metal and won't take the silver. Very sad that poor plating takes away from the beauty of a really nice salt. This Kralik drape salt is one of them. It would look amazing with a shiny rim.

Lots of beauties since I last visited - I was spending time cleaning - polishing and looking marks up and got carried away and far behind - So I decided to just at least clean them - but if I do not know the maker and date - I will find it later - The month is disappearing and I seem to be short of functioning time lately - So I will try and have some fun during the day and take posting breaks to show you some of what I have before the month is over - DUH

Figured I should start doing some groupings or I will not get them all up before the end of the month - My milky glass - All are hallmarked sterling rims - except the delightfully cheery yellow in the front - It is marked Made in Germany - The spoon with the green matches the mark on its rim and the pink set all match and are original to each other -

Okay more chores - Baked some chicken - Can't seem to figure out how to cook for one for cooking for many and freezing for one - Well whatever I don't eat first - lol lol

Hi Nancy - I have a note that says the rim is Birmingham 1904 and Henry Bourne - There is also a registry mark noted - I will polish the rim later as there are two places with a row of marks - Also some writing on the base that is hard to read - I will try to see if the bright sun light will let them show enough for a picture when it pops out better this afternoon-
