I will need to consider salts like this with two pointed ends boat shaped. I think they are usually called that. I don't have any of the row boat shaped salts, usually pressed in patterns like Daisy & Button. This red salt is cut glass.

I forgot to add the photo, and now the program won't let me do another one with the photo.

Same shape in light blue, also cut glass.

True boat, or Viking ship. sterling silver. I have the boat in pewter as well. No photo on hand.

Old Waterford, blue-grey glass, with the boat shaped bowl.

Light green found in England. The old ones like the first two usually have a lemon squeezer foot, the newer ones a solid foot.

I have a row of the old boat shaped pedestals in clear glass, high shelf I can't reach. I always loved them. Maybe others can post some pictures of that type.

Lovely lavender color, Debi. I think if we had to post only truly boat shaped, we would run out of examples very quickly. Just the one like #13 and the celluloid ones. Oh, and the Vikings.

My usual "rule of thumb" for salts is "if will hold salt, It's a SALT! Same applies to Boat Salts, if it's shaped like a boat, call it a Boat Salt!! Our Computer Man was here Tuesday, and loaded all the salt pictures that I have taken this past year! Now we just have to find time to show some of them! I'm going to the Dentist this morning, and we're taking a dozen boxes of Heisey Glass to the Auction House, this afternoon(That's just the Heisey that I'm willing to "PART WITH!)

Nancy V, I could use all of my own salts, but there would be no Daum or no plique-a-jour for sure. I have a lot that are not blue but it's true that blue and/or blue and white do dominate.

Thanks Susie. One of very few yellow salts I have unless you count the individuals made in blue, amber, green and yellow.

I finally sprung for a couple of Daums, but I've never had but a few plique-a-jours, and only the newer ones which I sold. I admire the plique boats, but not enough to pay the price.

A pair of plaque-a jours by Hammer ... As I remember I bought the pair from a seller who didn't know what they were. They were still a little pricey for me, but hundreds less than what was the listed price at the time. Sometimes you can luck out.
