This is the single coral salt, another like Lynda's double in #7. They were Commemorative salts at one of the earlier conventions. I don't think they were very popular. 6th Convention in Chicago.

I've always loved those shells with the lobster feet and bits of coral that look like something found at the bottom of the sea. I may have had one long ago. I have to take a run through my external hard drive to see if I can find anything for this topic.

Mary, the bowl of this salt matches the one with a mermaid sitting on the tail. I don't know if they were sold as a pair or not. I bought mine separately but the glass bowls are a perfect match. I posted them at #27. The "whale tail" salts were bought together so I assume they are a legit pair, although the tails are different.

I've been giving this some thought and want to get back to basics. It was never supposed to be about how many salts everyone could post or how to justify adding salts that didn't really apply. So we are going to start over with specific makers and specific types.
